Cyber technology and gender

As humans develop increasingly smarter machines, we may be building in a dangerous bias, to society's detriment. The technology sector, in areas such as cybersecurity development and STEM (science, technology, engineering and maths) in general, is overwhelmingly male. That gender imbalance inevitably limits diversity of thinking and means that cyber technology, both in its design and in the analytical output produced, are likely to mirror the biases that prevail in the world in which we live.

Threat of serious organised crime to national security

Serious and organised crime has been described as the deadliest national security threat faced by the UK. It persistently erodes our economy and communities and affects more UK citizens than any other national security threat, impacting on citizens, public services, businesses, institutions, national reputation and infrastructure. The 2015 Strategic Defence and Security Review made it its aim "to reduce substantially the level of serious and organised crime affecting the UK and our interests". It has not succeeded in that ambition.

COVID-19: Vaccine Literacy

COVID-19 has resulted in a global health and economic crisis. The lack of proven therapeutics and vaccines for COVID-19 has resulted in radical shutdowns of all parts of society in a bid to curb the spread of the virus. Vaccines offer the greatest longer-term protection from the impact of COVID-19. Numerous effects globally are racing to develop vaccines in record time. However, once we have vaccines which have been trialled, tested and shown to be safe and effective to use in humans, there will need to be significant uptake (around 90%) of the vaccine across populations for populations to be protected. This initiative aims to establish cross-sectoral networks to improve vaccine literacy to ensure populations are ready for 1) involvement in trials for candidates as they come on line 2) wider population uptake of vaccines once they are widely available. plt will engage across the private and public sector as well as civil society to build demand and acceptance for COVID-19 vaccines.
